STORIES IN STONE

MUGDOCK CASTLE

South West Tower

THE GRAHAMS

The Grahams — one of the best known families in Scottish history — owned land in Stirlingshire for hundreds of years. They were there at the time of Wallace and Bruce before 1300 and the castle at Mugdock was a Graham stronghold until around 1700. Here they held court and had their prison — much needed in what were often troubled times.

The Great Marquis

The most famous Graham was James, Fifth Earl of Montrose (1612 — 1650), a fine soldier who was known as the Great Marquis. He led the Covenanters in several victories against Charles I, but later became disillusioned with the leaders of the Covenant and joined King "Charles" side. Again he showed his military skills in a series of Royalist victories, but was betrayed and taken prisoner. On 21st May, 1650 he was hanged, drawn and quartered at the Cross in Edinburgh; his head was placed over the gate of the prison, and his arms and legs sent to Glasgow and other main towns to be displayed over their gates. After the Restoration of Charles II, his remains were buried in St. Giles' Cathedral.

Although the "stately house of Mugdock" was partly destroyed on Parliament's order in 1641, James Graham returned to live there until 1644. While the Graham was away on campaign, the Laird of Buchanan was ordered to attack the castle and remove "all the gates and iron windows". Mugdock Castle was subsequently forfeited to the Marquis of Argyll. When it was returned to the Grahams in 1655 the house was uninhabitable; it took two years to rebuild but was "a poor dwelling for a Marquis".

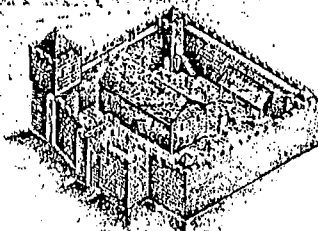

In 1662 the Grahams bought Buchanan Old House near Drymen. Mugdock declined in importance, although it did continue to be used both as a prison and a court — one David Dinn being tried there in 1736 for wilful fire raising. The last Graham left Mugdock around 1840.

THE EARLY CASTLE

The earliest reference to a Castle at Mugdock is in 1372. It was built around a courtyard, which was entered through a gatehouse with a portcullis. All that remains now is a high stone wall with towers on the north-west and south-west corners; high up on the south-west tower you can see a blocked doorway which suggests that there was a walkway along the top of the wall (1).

The North-West Tower

Little of this tower survives. The ground floor room was converted into a cellar in the 1600's by the construction of an arched ceiling and the first floor room became a kitchen.

The Early Castle — An Artist's Impression

The South-West Tower

The south-west tower has four storeys, with a single room on each floor and a parapet walk on the top. The ground floor room was probably a guard room with its own garderobe (toilet). The main entrance to the tower is at first floor level and is reached by an external stair. This leads to the Laird's Retiring Room with its arched ceiling and fireplace. The second floor room with its fireplace was the Laird's Bedroom; access to the upper storeys was by means of a staircase within the wall. All the rooms were lit through slit windows, some of which survive in their original form (2).

The Inner Courtyard

The buildings in the courtyard included the Laird's Hall, where the Laird and his family dined. This Hall probably stood against the wall between the two towers (3).

THE OUTER COURTYARD

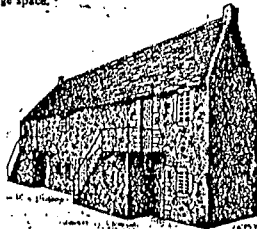

As a result of the increasing importance of both the family and the castle the defended area was enlarged some time before 1500 when a second wall was built. This can still be traced on the ground (4). Within this extended courtyard area it is likely that lean-to houses were built against the wall. This area was occupied by the Grahams' followers. In the south the wall is 20' high and contains an original, although altered gateway (5). Two interesting gun-loops of inverted keyhole pattern can still be seen on the outer face of this wall (6). On the north side of the outer courtyard a small tower projects from the wall. It has three chutes at its base suggesting that the upper part was used as a latrine (7).

The Chapel

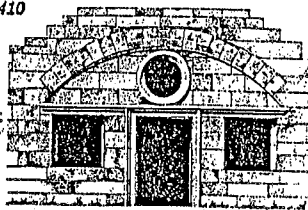

More building took place in the outer courtyard after 1500 with the construction of the Domestic Range and a structure, known as the "Chapel". This was already roofless by 1700 although its walls survived in a reasonable state until around 1850. It is now derelict, with only two side walls still standing.

The Domestic Range

A range of living and storage accommodation was built in the outer courtyard against the enclosing wall. This range has been much altered at different periods and work is now being done to repair it. It still retains its cross-stepped gables and original height of two storeys. The original windows were small and access to the upper floors was by means of external staircases, now destroyed. The fireplaces at first floor level at either end of the range confirm that these upper floors were used for living accommodation. The ground floor included storage space.

Domestic Range Around 1650

Summer House

THE WALLED GARDEN

The last members of the Graham family to live at Mugdock were three unmarried sisters. The architectural style of the Summer House suggests that it was built between 1820 and 1830 on behalf of these Graham ladies. The Walled Garden with its two levels of terrace would have been laid out at the same time and is likely to have been largely ornamental.

Carved Stone, Victorian Mansion

THE VICTORIANS

After the last of the Grahams left Mugdock around 1840 the Castle and Estate were occupied by a series of tenants, the most notable of whom was John Guthrie Smith. Smith was a well-known local antiquarian whose family had links with Craigend. In 1874 he was granted a lease of the Castle by the Duke of Montrose. He demolished the earlier house in the Castle courtyard and built a large mansion in the Scottish Baronial style. Although this mansion was largely demolished in 1967, old plans and photographs show something of its original grandeur. Smith also built stables and offices in the outer courtyard and altered and repaired the older castle buildings, linking his mansion house to the south-west tower by means of a covered walkway at first floor level. The remains of the arched supports for this can still be seen (8).

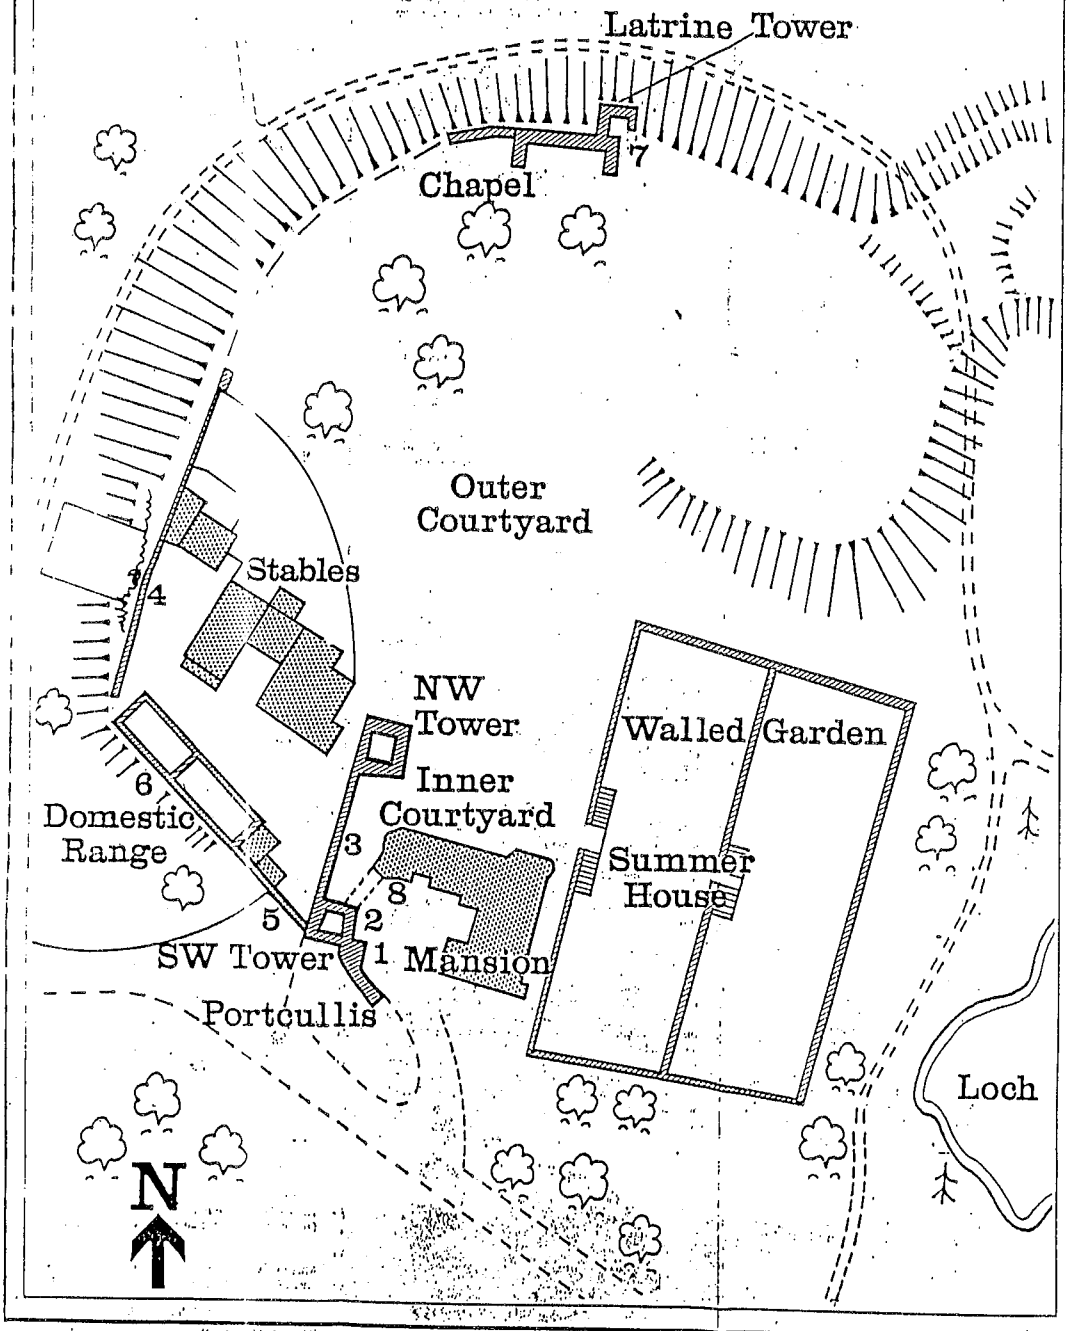

Mansion House

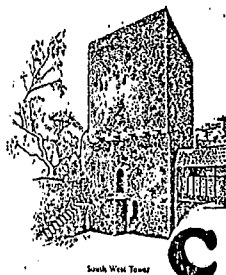

MUGDOCK TODAY

Smith was succeeded by numerous other tenants, and the Duke of Montrose finally sold the Estate and Castle to the family of Sir Hugh Fraser in 1945. It was last occupied in 1948.

Mugdock was gifted to the Central Regional Council by Sir Hugh Fraser in 1981 for use as a Country Park. The current programme of development work includes the repair of Mugdock's ancient buildings. Initial work has concentrated on the Domestic Range and additional work is now going ahead on the two towers and the portcullis.
